Water cop patrols Beverly Hills area

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. (AP) — When Willie Villa drives his three-wheel cart through the streets of this movie star mecca, water wasters turn down their hoses. Beverly Hills has discovered the drought, and Villa is its water cop.

Villa's title is environmental inspector for the Beverly Hills water department, but his job is more policeman than bureaucrat.

Villa stops residents and gardeners who are sprinkling their lawns or washing down their courtyards or driveways, or using their hoses to sweep leaves and other debris into the gutter.

Covering Beverly Hills on a random, unscheduled basis in a three-wheel motorized cart, the 55-year-old Villa is authorized to write a $25 ticket for repeated infractions, but so far he hasn't had to pull out his pencil.

Villa's assignment resulted from the severe drought facing California.

During the last several months, Beverly Hills and other Southern California communities have been occasional targets of some residents in hardhit Northern California, who say their southern neighbors' water-wasting lifestyle is unfair given severe curtailment to the north. Southern California's water supply comes from the north.

In contrast to San Francisco, which is having its worst drought in history, the Los Angeles area has had 12.30 inches of rain so far this season, with 14.04 inches considered normal.
