

AVOID RELIGIOUS CULTSLower-class can't be conned

WASHINGTON (AP) — A California psychiatrist says lower-class teen-agers are less likely than their more affluent peers to get mixed up with religious or racial cults because these youths "can recognize a street hustle."

"Very few of the cults are able to recruit lower-class young adults, either black or white," said Margaret Singer, a psychiatric professor at the University of California in San Francisco.

In an article in a recent edition of Journal, published by the National Association of Private Psychiatric Hospitals, Ms. Singer said:

"Lower-class youths in the United States, primarily, know there are no free dinners and no free meals. They can recognize a street hustle."

The report was written before the ritualistic mass suicide earlier this month involving more than 900 members of the Peoples Temple cult commune at Jonestown, Guyana.

Ms. Singer said there are about 250 different cults in the U.S. and that the larger and more prominent ones use extremely sophisticated recruitment methods which are taught to their followers.

These methods include getting close enough to gaze into a person's eye to determine whether the person is a warm, loving person who would be easy to recruit or one who would be hard to get.

"They begin their love-bombing of the new recruit from that point onward," she wrote.

"Middle and upper-class young adults have not had enough experience with street hustlers in growing up to know how artful deceivers on the street can operate."

The psychiatrist said she based her research on interviews with 250 young people with cult experience.
