

NEW YORK (AP) — Lunda Hoyle Gill has shared a shower with a deadly poisonous green mamba snake; travelled down a jungle river in a dugout while crocodiles glided alongside; been stranded for four days on a fogbound island in the middle of the Bering Sea, 40 miles from Siberia.

It's all part of the job for the portrait artist, a five-foot-two, green-eyed blonde with a rare taste for adventure and a determination to preserve on canvas the vanishing cultures of the world.

I'm too naive to be scared," says Mrs. Gill, whose travels have taken her to Africa, Papua New Guinea, Indonesia, Australia and Alaska in the last five years.

Her goal is to capture the beauty of the cultures of primitive tribes, such as the Masai in Kenya and the aborigines in Australia, before they disappear.

"They're vanishing so fast," she said in an interview during a New York visit. "Everybody wants to wear Levis and T-shirts now, and all the native women want to look like Ann Margret."

Artist eyes adventure

Is she wary about living with primitive tribes in remote villages halfway around the world?

Mrs. Gill explains that as a child she learned not to be afraid of people because she moved around frequently with her parents.

"So I feel very free to go to anybody or into any situation," she says. "I think that by my opening up to them, they open up to me. I really couldn't paint these people if they didn't give themselves totally to me."

Mrs. Gill's portraits hang in museums, universities and private collections in the United States, Canada, Mexico and Europe.

Mrs. Gill, who works exclusively with oils, renders most of her paintings with a palette knife, a method which seems to bring the portraits alive with varying textures.

"I find when I take this dead canvas and all of a sudden it turns into a living human being looking back at me, the excitement is unbelievable," she says.

When she packs for a trip she has to take "every single thing" with her.
