

Several reasons for labor production decline

OTTAWA (CP) — Inflation, the structure of energy-related industries and energy-price shocks are to blame for the drop in labor productivity, an article in the latest Bank of Canada Review suggests.

The production growth rate per worker, researcher Gerald Stuber writes, "was about 2.2 per cent through the two decades from 1954 to 1974 but dropped to about 0.4 per cent over the 1975-79 business cycle."

Finance Minister Allan MacEachen has repeatedly angered labor and opposition critics by pointing to that drop in productivity when telling workers they shouldn't expect wage increases to keep pace with inflation.

Although MacEachen has said he isn't blaming workers for the drop in productivity, he has often been accused of fighting inflation on the backs of workers.

The article gives little credence to theories that the increased use of unskilled workers — women and young people — or a lower education level has led to a decrease in productivity.

GIVENCHY

Celebrate the arrival of "Eau de Givenchy" fragrance.

"Eau de Givenchy", the latest scent from Givenchy, is young at heart and lightly floral. Distinguished but surprisingly lively with hints of rose, ylang ylang, jasmin, honeysuckle and narcissus with subtle suggestions of mandarin and grapefruit for zest. An original eau de toilette that is full of joie de vivre.
