Movie Nostalgia

By Robert J. Levy

Long before Eddie Murphy invaded the tony enclaves of Beverly Hills, another black movie cop ventured far from home to solve a crime: Sidney Poitier's 1967 film "In the Heat of the Night." Though somewhat simplistic in its study of racism, the film breathes life as a taut, grimy murder mystery, and boasts sterling performances by Poitier and Rod Steiger.

Tibbs is a smooth, educated, somewhat prissy Northern city detective who stumbles onto a sleepy town seething with racism only to find himself embroiled in an investigation of the murder of a prominent white citizen. He also becomes involved in an alternately dramatic and comic love-hate relationship with the chief of police — a good ol' boy played with superb, edgy intensity by Steiger.

As the townsfolk increasingly menace this interloper, Steiger's prejudices give way to admiration for Tibbs' technical expertise and pluck. And Tibbs discovers that even a pudgy old cop like Steiger has some lessons to teach.

The plot becomes too neat and moralistic by the time the murder is solved, but the dialogue crackles, Quincy Jones' funky score (with the title track sung by Ray Charles) bops along, and even the parade of redneck stereotypes is fun to watch.

Question: Which actor received an Academy Award for his performance?

Answer: Steiger, who won the Oscar as Best Actor.
