For all kinds of weather, check Filson, a rugged tradition since 1897. Made in North America, Filson outdoor clothing was born to meet the challenge of the famous Alaska-Klondike Gold Rush. An era when quality and durability were not a matter of survival. After the gold rush, Filson 100 percent virgin wool cruisers, 'tin pants' and 'tin cruisers' continued to grow in popularity with the logging and construction industries. Also popular today, Filson's waxed 100 percent cotton duck offers water repellent comfort for those who spend time out of doors in all kinds of weather.

Whether you live the life of a cowboy or wish you did, Koolah all-weather wear from 'down under' fills the bill with three-quarter jackets and full-length coats. New Koolah-proof fabric (oilskin's big brother) is weatherproof, windproof and thornproof. Looks, feels, breathes like cotton but has the durability of synthetics. Each cotton thread has a polyester core and is treated with oil/wax weatherproofing and then an additional weatherproofing for good measure. The result is the toughest fabric you'll find in outdoor clothing today.

Also from Australia - hats to top things off. There's the Snowy River hat by Akubra. Rakish, jaunty, one-of-a-kind.

From the Cutana Hat Company - suede and grain leather hats available in a selection of fashionable colors and a comprehensive range of sizes.
