A Tabor solution put forth

Some members of a task force think they have the solution on how to revive Tabor Lake.

In the summer of 1993, 90,000 Tabor Lake whitefish died suddenly because of a massive accumulation of phosphorus at the lake bottom. The phosphorous either sucked the oxygen out of the bottom of the lake or spurred the growth of weeds which moved the oxygen away from the bottom.

The Tabor Lake Task Force says the solution is to siphon the phosphorous out by using either a weir or replacement water from an altered creek. The task force rejected what it called "Band-Aid" solutions like dumping lime into the lake to deactivate the phosphorous temporarily, or to pump oxygen into the lake. The group will now take its ideas to consultants to figure out exactly how to go about the siphoning process.
